One day a bust without a head thought he'd rest, undisturbed. He thought he'd kidnap me into his den of leaves and spiders. I noticed the obstinate indifference in the fissures, and in a breath he went inside. One afternoon at the park a carp thought to erase all distance and to reunite a few elements. Air, earth, water. Deep down, even my camera fears me. Mine is not a job. A photographer, I photograph everything. It is a way of being and therefore there is no way to stop. Through simple ocular vision I photograph, because I can't not.

Andrea Ruggeri was born in 1980 in Rome. He collaborates with magazines and companies as a freelance photographer. He works for Argentinian and Chinese tourism campaigns, and for Philipp Plein designer. His pictures have appeared in National Geographic, L'Espresso, Geo, Gambero Rosso, Repubblica, La Nación, Class, Ansa. He exhibited at "Festival Internazionale di Roma" of photography and at the Museum Of Contemporary Art in Shanghai. He currently lives between Rome and Milan.
